The President of the Convention arose and delivered the following address:

Gentlemen of the Convention:

Before putting the motion of final adjournment, allow me to return you my most sincere thanks and acknowledgments for the honor conferred upon me by the passage of the resolution yesterday, coming as it does from such a body. I shall cherish it, gentlemen, as long as life shall last with me, and transmit it to my children as a bright inheritance which the poor services of their father little merited. Our labors have now drawn to a close. The important duties we were called upon to perform, on the part of the people of Texas, are discharged, and I trust in a manner which will be satisfactory to all the people of Texas, satisfactory to the Congress and people of the United States, and satisfactory to the friends of Republican government throughout the civilized world. We are about, after a short season, considering the immense labor performed to adjourn. We are about again to go and mingle among our constituents, many of us never again to take part in political strife, or to be engaged in political action. The proceedings of this Convention, I think I may safely say without vanity or any undue prejudice in favor of Texas, our adopted land, may well compare with those of any similar body which has met within the last hundred years. They have been marked by a degree of decorum, and a spirit of good feeling, which I trust in God will continue to characterize the people of Texas, as long as our country shall endure. In the ardor of debate, from the difference of opinion which may have existed with regard to some principle adopted in this Constitution, for a moment the feelings of gentlemen may have been slightly excited; I am glad to see that all this has passed away; I am glad to see that the spirit of harmony and good feeling, and the emotions of patriotism which were manifested upon the first day of our meeting, have continued to preside over our deliberations, until this the day of our adjournment: And I trust they will continue to exist in our bosoms, and that whether separated or together, we shall ever entertain towards each other those kind feelings which have been manifested here. I trust that each member of this Convention will carry them home to his constituents, and do all in his power to make this Constitution as acceptable as possible to the people, in order that it may appear to the government of the United States, that we go into the Union in the proper manner, and that the vile slanders hurled against us by our enemies, that we are a band of disorganizers, is false and foul.

I trust, too, that when this Constitution shall go into operation, the angry passions attendant upon political dissensions will be hushed, that all sectional feelings and jealousies, and the strifes of personal ambition will cease, and that for many long years to come, it will continue the organic law of a people united as a band of brothers, animated by the best feelings of the human heart, and prompted in action by that pure and lively patriotism which has characterized Texas thus far.

In my retirement, I carry with me the best feelings for each one of you, and the warmest desires for your success and the success of Texas.

On motion of Mr. Latimer of Red River, the Convention adjourned sine die.
