Messrs. Paschal, Waul and Ledbetter were appointed a committee to conduct the President elect to the chair.

Upon taking the chair, the President elect addressed the Convention as follows :

Gentlemen of the Convention:

We have met together under peculiar circumstances. We have passed through a period in the history of our country, momentous in its character, and from which a new era will be inaugurated. As the representatives of the people of Texas, we have been intrusted, at a critical moment, with their most sacred interests. We should act with the purest patriotism, and, in my humble judgment, with a view alone to the future, uninfluenced by past predilections or opinions, and uncontaminated by passion or prejudice.

The period through which the country has passed has been one of extraordinary gloom. It has been a period which has made the stoutest hearts quail, and the purest patriots tremble. I recur to the past with no other purpose than to recall to mind our situation, and the responsibilities now devolving upon us.

Allow me to express the conviction already impressed upon my mind, that your deliberations will be harmonious, and marked with that spirit which should alone prevail where such great interests are at stake. Let us by our action strengthen the hands of the Executive of the Nation, and, by a ready and willing compliance with his suggestions, show to our national brethren that we are, in good faith, disposed to renew our allegiance to the general government. Let us bury, upon the altar of our common country, all the recent past, with all its painful associations and recollections; and, upon that altar, hallowed by the clustering reminiscences of three quarters of a century, renew our devotions to the Government of our Fathers—a government reared by sufferings, and consecrated by their blood, and in the glories of which we have an inheritance.

Let us kindle afresh, in our own bosoms, and in the bosoms of our fellow-citizens throughout the length and breadth of our noble State, the fires of patriotism that once burned so brightly in behalf of the general government, but which have been well nigh extinguished by the blood of civil war. Let the future deliberations of the Convention show to the authorities of the government and to the American people, that, although Texas is the last of the Southern States seeking restoration, the delay was caused by no fault of her people.

I thank you, gentlemen, for the honor you have conferred upon me, and am sensible of my incapacity to preside over your deliberations with the ability necessary for such an occasion. I know I shall receive, in the discharge of the duties assigned me, your cordial support. I cherish the hope that our labors will redound to the general good of our own State, and to the promotion of the great interests of the whole country. And, although it is true that sorrow and gloom have filled the whole land, and the smoke of war gone up to the heavens from burning habitations and desolated districts, and every household been draped in mourning, yet I trust that our children and their children may look back to the hour of the assembling of this Convention, and bless it, as one of the happiest and most auspicious in the history of our country.

I hope that our labors will enable Texas to hold up her head once more, and take that proud position among the States of the American Union to which she is unquestionably entitled; that peace, prosperity and happiness, and a fraternal feeling, may be restored, not only to us, but throughout our common country.

I thank you, gentlemen, for your kindness and attention.

No one having received a majority of all the votes cast, and the name of J. B. Morris being withdrawn, the Convention proceeded to a third ballot; which resulted in Chalmers receiving 48 votes, and Falkener 21 votes.
